Going Home: Witness Cremation

“The grieving process is unique for every situation,” said Edward Sagel, Managing Partner of Going Home. “And witnessing a cremation is an intimate act, an ancient funeral rite that for some religious sects – like those of the Sikh, Hindu, and Jainism faiths – is an important part of their tradition. We have modernized the process, creating and maintaining a welcoming and loving environment that helps those who wish to use this process as a way to say goodbye to a family member.”

Witness Cremations are growing in popularity as a funeral option because people want to witness their loved ones handled with dignity and respect until the very end. They also want to participate in the send-off ceremony as part of the grieving process. The process itself is relatively simple.

After getting a death certificate and the necessary permit, participants will share comforting words and eulogies about their loved one, and then, when the time is right, the casket is placed into the cremation enclosure to start the cremation process. The witness room is directly adjacent to the cremation chamber, so families can watch through a window as their loved one's body is cremated. The entire process usually takes between two to five hours. So, depending on the crematory, families can watch some or the entire cremation.

“Witness Cremations are a powerful and memorable way for people to say goodbye,” said Albert Bloomfield, Managing Partner of Going Home. “Our spacious witnessing room allows friends and family to spend time together during the viewing, allowing people space to grieve, while also communicating the death in a concrete way to help mourners begin to make peace with the passing of their loved ones. We control this process from start to finish, so families are able to move through the ceremony completely at ease.”
